PALSE PRUITS AND FLOWERS.

They Mutely Deceive the Unwary Visitor in

The making of artificial flowers has been carried to most deceiving lengths. Seldom does a week pass but what Billy Edwards, at the Hoffman House, has to decide a bet as to whether the vines, with their apparently luscious clusters of grapes, which cling to the frame and gas jets around one of the big pictures are real or not, and visitors, who are not countrymen by any means, always insist that the key which hangs in luxurious masses on the wall near the cigar-stand is genuine.

Capt. J. M. Collier tells a good story of two gentlemen looking over the baths in Twenty eighth street.

One of them, he says, was delighted with the ventilation and beauty of the place and could find only words of praise until he looked over and saw what Capt, "Jim" calls "Everard's Garden."

"Take 'em away," he said. "Anything but flowers."

Then, explanatorily, he added the two the Hoffman House, has to decide a bet as to Fashionable society, which is notoriously sportive, will attend the Country Club's grand steeplechases at Pelham to-day, and on Friday, in a body. There will be six races to-day. Two important additions have been made to the programmes printed by the morning papers. The first race to-day, a maiden polo pony flat race, will have a fine cup added, and the third race, a hunter's lightweight steeplechase, is a $20 sweepstakes as well as for the ladies' cup. "A Possible Case," Sydney Rosenfeld's brightly attractive play, enters upon the last week of its season to-night at the Madison Square Theatre. Manager Hill is entirely satisfied with its success. It has filled the Madison Square Theatre during the past four weeks, and its friends and admirers will doubtless turn out to bid it farewell for the present. The renung of the Thails Theatre by Manager H. R. Jacobs, as shown by last week's business, has proved a profitable undertaking. This week 'I'True Iriah Hearts" will be given at that house, There will be matiness to-day, Wednesday and Saturday.

EUFFALO BILL AND POPCORN.

The Claim That He Introduced the Delicaer in England Disputed. To the Editor of The Evening World ;

Buffalo Bill is claiming too much when he wants the credit of introducing popeorn est ing into England.

ing into England.

Many a penny I have spent on the luscious popcorn ball, and could name numbers of stores where it has been sold during the past twenty years, some of them very near the grounds of the Wild West show.

Buffalo Bill may have made eating popcorn more fashionable, but he never introduced it.

A STURDY BARYOM.

I notice in THE EVENING WORLD an article

I notice in The EVENING WOBLD an article in which it is stated that Buffalo Bill claims the sole honor of introducing pop-corn to the English public. This is a great mistake on Col. Cody's part.

In 1873, and, for all I can say, for some time before, an American named Strange sta ted a store in Scarborough. England, and during the season (Scarborough is a very fashionable watering-place) sold popcorn flavored with lemon, vanilla, chocc ste and ralafis, the price being four cents per ounce or 50 cents per pound. The same firm had at least six stores in other towns in England. I can vouch for the above, as most of my pocket money went that way.

The Queen Ate Some in 1845.

To the Editor of the Evening World :
I saw in The Evening World that Buffalo Bill claims the honor of first introducing Bill claims the honor of first introducing popcorn into England. If he thinks he did this he is very much mistaken. In about 1845 I knew a man by the name of Olmsted Ferris, who lived on a farm one mile west of Galesburg, I.l. He raised a large lot of popcorn and shipped some to England, went there himself, popped a barrel full of the corn and sent it to Queen Victoria and received her thanks for it.

These facts can be sustantiated by several persons now living in and near Galesburg.

THE NIGHT OF THE FIRE. BY B. G. PRANKS.

ET out of my sight, sir, this instant, and never dare to enter my house again upon such an errand!" exclaimed Squire Brandon at last, after listening in speechless amazement to the modest demand of Frank Everett, the young organist of the village church, for the hand of his only child—his Florence—whose graceful, golden head he had resolved should wear the coronet of his old friend and neighbor, Lord Mere-worth.

"Confound his impudence!" muttered the irate old Squire, as after thus abruptly dismissing the presumptaous young organist, he entered the breakfast-room, where Florence, looking radiantly beautiful in her pure white morning robe—her sweet, Madonna face.

shaded by luxuriant tresses of that dim yet lustrous gold-dust color which the grand old masters so loved to paint—was seated behind the antique silver breakfast service, awaiting her father's appearance.

"What is the matter, papa?" she inquired, looking up as the Squire entered the room.

"Matter enough, child!" answered the old Squire. "Things have come to a pretty pass when a penniless rascal like young Everett has the unblushing effrontery to come to me with a modest request for the hand of my daughter. This comes of your fancy for learning the organ," he continued. "If it had not been for these confounded music lessons".

had not been for these confounded music lessons".

"Hush, papa;" said Florence, quietly, her eyes fixed intently upon the white tablecloth before her, and a faint blush stealing over her face; "Frank Everett is a gentleman."

"Gentleman, indeed!" resorted the Squire, angrily. "Fine gentleman, truly! Bon of some half-starved cursts! And hark ye, girl. I have put an end to these music lessons and forbidden the young puppy to ever enter my house sgain. If Mereworth likes to allow it when you are his wife, well and good; but I'll have no more of it under my roof."

I shall never be Lord Mereworth's wife, papa," said Florence, in a quiet but determined tone.

Twelve months had passed away since the morning when Frank Everett was so rudely dismissed from Brandon Court, and Christms shad come around once more.

With the return of Christmas came Frank Everett. Upon the rejection of his suit by the proud old Equire he had immediately given up his situation as organist and gone to London, where his genius and perseverance had at last won for him a brilliant position, and he returned, rich and famous, to the village he had quitted so sadly and despairingly a year before.

Christmas Eve was almost over. The clock of the village church was chiming the hour of 12, and the huge old pile of Brandon Court looked down darkly and frowningly upon the village from the wood-crowned fill across the frozen river.

Buddenly a wreath of blue curling smoke, followed by a bright jet of flame, arose from the snow-clad roof of the dark pile, and the next moment the village was alight with a red glare which aroused every sleeper, and the cry of "Fire!" thrilled through the silence of midnight.

Frank, who had been writing in his room, rushed into the street, and bounded with the speed of an arrow over the old stone bridge and up the hill towards the court.

and up the hill towards the court.

"Water!" was the cry from a hundred lips; but alas! a foot of hard, solid ice covered the river, and though a score of axes were at work in a moment to set free the imprisoned waters, long before the first bucket of the prectous fluid could reach the summit of the hill it was evident that the fire had made such mastery over the burning building that all efforts to arrest its progress would be hopeless.

In a few moments the face of Florence Brandon appeared at one of the bedroom windows. Frank, who, not knowing whether the inmates of the house had escaped, had been anxiously looking for her among the crowd, immediately recognized the pale yet firm face, and throwing off his coat, seized as aze, and with a few blows breaking op in the oaken hall door, dashed madly up the broad staircase, in spite of the smoke and flame which enveloped him.

After several vain attempts he at last opened After several vain attempts he at last opened the door of the Squire's bedroom, and there, seated on the side of the bed, pale, but calm, holding her father's hand between her own, was the object of his search.

"Oh, Frank, save him! Save papa!" she exclaimed, springing up and seizing his outstretched hands. "He broke his leg a week ago, and cannot walk," she whispered hurriedly, as, heedless or her entreaties, Frank was carrying her from the room.

"And you, Florenca?" replied Frank, releasing his hold and looking steadily into her face.

late, Frank, we shall meet again in heaven. But, oh! if you love me, save pana."

Approaching the bed, Frank lifted the half-unconscious form of the Squire in his arms, and with one last, lingering look at Florence, passed swiftly from the room.

Not a moment too soon—for, almost before he reached the ground floor, the staircasse came down with a crash which shook the whole house, and filed the hall with smoke and sparks.

A cheer greeted our here as he bore the Squire down the stone steps in front of the door, and resigning his burden to the care of the crowd, he immediately prepared to return for Florence.

But the task was more difficult than he had anticipated. The staircase was already gone; and as he stood looking for some other way of entrance, part of the front of the house came down, almost at his feet, and for a few moments the whole building was enveloped in thick, impenetrable volumes of smoke.

Then, with an agility that would have done honor to a member of the Arpine Club, he commenced climbing the ragged and projecting edge of the broken wall, until he reached the level of the room in which he had left Forence. Then a bound over the charred rafters, through which the flanes were again beginning to blaze—a momentary but desperate struggle for a foothold on the opposite side, while the bricks and mortar rattled down from under his sinking fest into the blazing abyas beneath—and by a mighty effort he swung himself on the floor of the corridor, and stood at the open doorway of the Squire's room.

Florence was on her knees, at the side of the bod, but the moment ahe heard Frank enter the room she sprang to her feet, and, without losing an instant, he caught her in his arms, and rushed to the door.

But escape that way was impossible, so hastily knotting together the coverings of But the task was more difficult than he had
